Candles

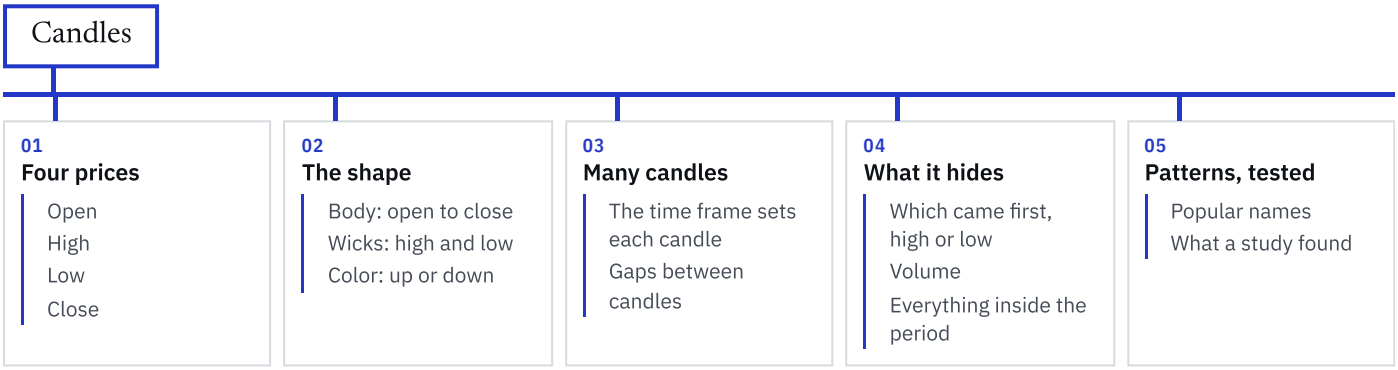

Open, high, low and close in one shape.

PLANNED

What you will learn

A candle packs four prices into one shape: where a period opened, its high, its low, and where it closed. The body runs from open to close; the thin lines above and below, called wicks, reach the high and the low. In this piece you learn to read one candle, then a row of them, and to see what a candle cannot show, such as whether the high or the low came first. We also look at what researchers found when popular candle patterns were tested on large US stocks: on their own, they were not generally profitable. Education only, never advice.
